Q: How to handle the redirected URL's that are not seen by server (by any browser)? I have a generic application that generates reports, queries, maps, etc. The URLs generated by the system are of the form /MyForm?param1=123¶m2=456. The problem is that some of them are actually invalid and get redirected by the browser to a page that says the page is not found. The server does not find these redirected URLs. How can I handle these types of URL's, so that I could identify the invalid URL's and redirect them to a valid one? I am using ASP.NET, C#, IIS, WCF, AJAX and JQuery. Thanks in advance for your help! A: You could redirect the non-existent URLs to a 404 error page that has the URL you want the user to see. Have the URL that the user sees also be the "success" URL for the AJAX call.

Overwintering of the leaves in some tree species increases resistance to herbivores in the following spring. Leaf damage from herbivores and the associated damage reduction in trees and shrubs are important factors influencing tree species diversity. Some tree species have developed a strategy to protect themselves from damage during winter, known as the "overwintering of leaves." The key question to be addressed is how the leaves are protected from herbivory when they are in deep dormancy and what is the nature of the associations between the insect herbivores and the overwintering leaves. In this study, the tree species Quercus myrsinifolia (Myrsinaceae) and Populus × canescens (Salicaceae) showed high amounts of damage by the insect herbivores, but they had lower damage levels compared with other tree species. We found that the tree species with a high level of damage also showed higher concentrations of volatile organic compounds (VOCs) emitted by their leaves. We also found that the overwintering leaves of the tree species exhibited higher levels of VOCs that are emitted in response to herbivore damage than the leaves that were still green in spring. The results suggest that the insect herbivore-derived VOCs might play a role in reducing
