The feature will use motion capture data collected from real-life players to power the game. The current FIFA Engine can create over 100 million new player animations. The game's AI, however, now only creates 25,000 player animations, a fraction of the current player count. According to EA, the initial study into game mechanics used motion capture data collected from 22 real-life football players. That data allowed EA to create an all-new in-depth feature that will impact the direction of gameplay in years to come. Using motion capture, EA created a hypermotion engine that uses data collected from 22 players playing a complete high-intensity football match to animate new, more-realistic player movements. On the field, the players run, hit, tackle, and jump. Two cameras capture their movement, allowing the engine to accurately animate players in detail. "Our goal was to make this new system more realistic than current player models," EA Sports Senior Gameplay Engineer Victor Habib said. "FIFA 22 will feature the most detailed players ever created." The game will also use RLM to animate player uniforms and equipment. For the first time in FIFA history, player gear will completely change appearance depending on personal attributes, like position or equipment. As equipment and appearance drastically changes, the challenge for AI becomes even greater. Since each real-life player has a different physical build, FIFA 22's AI needs to understand that in order to accurately respond to the player. With player attributes and on-field equipment influencing the way AI plays, the AI is vastly different than previous years. "We made a conscious decision to approach this [feature] from a new angle," Habib said. "We decided to do
