keynote at Mobile World Congress in Barcelona today, Sanjay Jha made the announcement in a session called 'AI for the masses'. As the video on both Android Police and PCMag is in Spanish, we've switched to Google Translate. Please note, that the translation will change bits and pieces as it tries to stay close to the original. Android

Police and PCMag Before we go too much into the talk, here are some key bullet points: Snapdragon 855 : Confirmed to have all the features that are supposed to be in the final version of the chip. The PDM controller has support for 512MB DRAM, not just 256MB. Also, the chip starts at 2.8 GHz and goes to 3.8 GHz with Turbo Boost. The power management is better, but still not the best, Jha says. The uplink should be improved to provide a better 5 GHz support. One of the advantages is that the chip should support 3x3 configuration of 5 Gbps uplink and 50 Mbps downlink. This can be set up as a dual-band 5G / 4G chip. Not sure if there are official 5G modems yet that will make use of the three antennas at the bottom of the phone. : Confirmed to have all the features that are supposed to be in the final version of the chip. The PDM controller has support for 512MB DRAM, not just 256MB. Also, the chip starts at 2.8 GHz and goes to 3.
