"Where's the love?" the eponymous band says. If the band is ghostbusters, then where's the love? That's the question posed by some recent psychology research by St. John's University Ph.D. student Julie Dannefer, who is also a musician. In her new study, Dannefer found that the people behind our favorite characters in pop culture can be more psychologically resembling to the characters' fantastical, fictional status than we might assume. The study, which was published this week in the journal Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin, involved a look at how the lyrics of 15 hit songs that were released between 1980 and 2004 were similar to the characters from those songs' fictional source material. Fans and laypeople alike can often misjudge their favorite fictional characters from pop culture and identify them with their real-life counterparts, Dannefer said. "The quality of the match (between the two) doesn't always indicate good judgment on the part of the fans," Dannefer said. "There's a chance that fans have a tendency to conflate the music they like with the music they are actually good at, and then conflate that with their real-life selves." Dannefer began her study in 2007 as a way to investigate her own musical fandom. Dannefer grew up in California and moved to Newfoundland in 2007 to go to university. She knew she liked the music of the 1980s and early e79caf774b

Although there are no epidemiological data that measure the prevalence of CFS in stroke patients, approximately 5% of stroke patients report having CFS. Additionally, I have observed several patients who have had CFS and had several previous acute cerebrovascular events. In this article, we review the relationship between stroke and CFS
