Back home from my latest visit to Tajikistan, I have been reflecting on the country and how people in the ex-Soviet republics view democracy. The terrain is magnificent. I visited the small town of Khujand, the capital of Daykundi Province in the north of the country. Khujand is a beautiful city. The town was founded in 1822 by Emir Ata-Mulla Khan, a noble from Georgia who was acting as a governor in the new part of the Russian empire. It lies in an area of lush, green mountains and wide fertile valleys, covered with woodland, aspens and orchards. The scene is idyllic. However, Khujand is a shadow of its former self. Like other provincial capitals of Tajikistan, people have been fleeing the violence and unrest created by civil wars since 1992. It is not too difficult to see why they are being driven out. Khujand is a victim of its own success. The town grew rapidly from the mid-1950s. But there was no development in its infrastructure. Roads were in a shocking state of disrepair. Houses were badly built and very basic. The town had an inadequate sewage system. There was no electricity in most of the town. There was no clean water. The town was dangerous. Gangs were armed and drunk. It had an unhappy reputation as one of Central Asia's most lawless towns. It was also a dumping ground for alcoholics. The town's municipal government was corrupt. Irresponsible mayor bosses extorted money from the local population. The local police were inefficient. Hence, Khujand attracted troublemakers from all over Central Asia, mostly from Afghanistan, who had no respect for local customs. They robbed the locals, extorted money, kidnapped people and fought with
