The present invention relates to a method for the treatment of zebra mussels in the aquarium and aquarium systems. More particularly, the present invention relates to a bacterium that is effective in the biological treatment of zebra mussels in the aquarium or aquarium system and in the prevention of infection by zebra mussels in aquaria having water circulation systems which circulate water past areas where zebra mussels are growing. Zebra mussels are native to Eurasia but have been found in many parts of the world. Zebra mussels were first reported in the United States in 1975 at the Charles Pratt and Company shipyard in Baltimore. Since their introduction, the mussels have been identified throughout the entire US. In various other countries, they have been identified in Europe, Africa and Asia. The natural habitat of zebra mussels is in bays, inlets and estuaries, from fresh water to sea water, and of various depths. Zebra mussels are filter-feeding animals. They attach to hard substrates and enjoy the protection and protection of the hard shell to which they adhere. They deposit a white, calcareous cement which hardens and which adheres to other hard objects in the environment, such as wooden objects or metal objects in aquariums or in the aquarium environment. The two anterior tentacles on the mussel face towards the mud or sand through which the mussel draws its food, generally the particles of debris that are swept to the surface by the flow of water. The mussel is a "periphyton feeder" ♦
