Visit >

Today is the release date for Guild Wars 2: Heart of Thorns. The DLC serves as a direct follow-up to 2015's The Fall of the Shimmering Curtin and is set in a new region of Tyria called the Lands Between. Originally teased at PAX Prime, the expansion adds a slew of new features, including a story that must be completed before players are eligible for the game's end-game events.

The tabletop role-playing game

On the tabletop version, it's half a book of rules and half a book of maps and grid lines and it's a real struggle to figure out what things are.

I imagine this game has been on my to-play list for a while now.

And now I can finally try it out myself.

For some time now, I've watched the Pathfinder module for Lie of the Land, which at its conclusion covers how to design and run a tabanticism game. In it, the scenario describes a play session. But I thought there are many elements missing in this play session that I think make it too long to simply play through in a single play session:

For one thing, the scenario is presented as a collection of narrative paragraphs followed by a list of questions. This implies an approach of writing scenarios for players to read and then recall and follow those rules in the moment. But as a GM, I know this is misleading and boring.

I think the script has a subtext of using the rules at your advantage to make a long sequence of active GM play
