Initially, senior police officers were allegedly told to leave office work for a few days after the attacks. But soon after they took over the investigation, senior officers started talking about going back to work and going back to their office jobs. In fact, soon after the attacks, when the local police started calling the companies for employees, they were asked to select people, presumably the most senior staff. After an area has been cordoned off, the bomb squad and dog squad generally enter at that point. After locating a suspicious object, the personnel go back to the police station to pass on any information they have. The local police have said that they are seeking a clarifications from the five companies involved in this case for the role of their employees as well. According to Economic Times, this has led to further twists and turns in the investigation. The local police has also decided to strike a balance between the needs of the police and the financial needs of the companies. Neither company has come forward to assist in the investigation, and the local police seems to be facing some sort of identity crisis. The local police are clueless as to why the companies are denying any involvement in these cases. Interestingly, no arrests have been made so far. The local police are afraid that they would lose out on a crucial financial assistance. The local police have to provide the companies with the security assistance on a regular basis to support the police station. Another version has emerged as well. A Malayali man has been arrested on Thursday in connection with the case. According to reports, K Nishi, a resident of Kollam in Kerala, was allegedly calling one call centre located in Rajasthan. A Times of India report suggests that the police have launched a manhunt for k Nishi and that he has been arrested. 5ec8ef588b
