More particularly, the invention relates to in situ adducts of novel tetrahydropyridine derivatives with fumaric acid or its esters. These compositions can be used as prophylactics and therapeutic agents for treating diseases of the eye, for example, uveitis, retinal damage, and other eye related diseases such as macular degeneration and diabetic retinopathy. A variety of methods of administering drugs to the eye are known. Currently, the most widely used routes of drug administration are topical and oral. Topical drug delivery has certain inherent advantages, such as minimal systemic exposure, fewer side effects and decreased cost of drug administration. One method of topical drug delivery involves topical application of solutions of drug in liquid vehicles. This type of formulation has been well-documented. For example, in U.S. Pat. No. 4,503,934, a drug is delivered to the eye by applying a solution of the drug in an ophthalmically acceptable medium, e.g., an aqueous medium, at a concentration of 0.1% to 10%. Another method of topical drug delivery involves application of solid particles of the drug dispersed in a liquid vehicle. The particles are intended to provide both size and shape delivery as well as release characteristics. For example, in U.S. Pat. No. 5,059,423, a suspension of drug particles is prepared in an aqueous medium, and the suspension is then applied to the ocular surface. Another method of topical drug delivery involves application of drug-polymer conjugates that form polymeric gels in situ on the ocular surface. Polymeric gels, also referred to as "in situ forming gels," are typically formed from polymerizable monomers and therapeutic agents, and form solid, biocompatible gels in situ. The gels are allowed to form in situ on the ocular surface, and the solid, biocomp
