Choose your video and download it to your computer for free!Traditionally, paper has been the standard media for disseminating information. However, the advent of the Internet and e-mail has revolutionized the method for disseminating information. Generally, a message is sent to an e-mail address. When the message is delivered to a mailbox, an e-mail server is used to read the message. If the e-mail address is valid, the message is stored for later retrieval. Unfortunately, many messages from unknown senders are "bounced" because the message is not sent to the intended e-mail address. When this occurs, the sender of the message is notified that the message was not received. However, this does not give the sender the opportunity to view the message. To avoid this problem, unsolicited bulk e-mail (UBE) was created. UBE simply replaces the sender of the e-mail with a user that is classified as being a UBE. All messages thereafter are sent from the UBE. When a mail server reads the message, the server sends the message to the UBE. If the UBE does not receive the messages within a predetermined period of time, the UBE is automatically deleted. For example, all messages sent from the same e-mail address over the same time period are automatically deleted. It is interesting to note that UBE does not exist in any legal statute or regulation of the United States Federal Government. Typically, UBE is created by software programs called mailers or mail-bots. The term mail-bot is used herein to refer to a computer program which has the capability to send a mass of e-mails in a relatively short period of time. This capability is obtained by employing a large number of computers (commonly referred to as machines or hosts) to
