Now it's possible to download a pdf cropped to the print size (plus 2-3" per side), and let your printer prepare it for printing. In addition, you can open a published pdf in Photoshop and save it back as a pdf for further use. The feature works much better than the cropping feature offered by Adobe. Last year I lamented the fact that an image I created didn't look right in the browser. This year I was happy about it. I ran into an issue where my Deviant Art page , which I use to test the browser's rendering of web pages, started showing canvas resize for in a browser. Then I realized another browser copy of it (Chrome on iPad) had the same problem as well. It turns out this is a bug in Creative Cloud , and that has since been resolved. Thanks, Adobe! Adobe has updated its Eye-Fi site. After choosing your camera model, there's a link to "Download a driver that contains a firmware update for your camera that will enable Eye-Fi to transmit JPEG and TIFF images directly to your camera." This is presumably an attempt to keep customers like me happy by removing the need to purchase the Eye-Fi Express card. After purchasing the card, the new update process is actually quite easy: it's a simple menu system to select what to download and install. I tested a few models from various manufacturers, and worked quite well for my few tests. Point being, Eye-Fi Express is easy to activate and setup and the new update procedure is also pretty simple. The Beta release of Adobe Photoshop Lightroom 5 was released yesterday, and it contains a few significant changes. As expected, Adobe focuses on performance improvements. Changes include: Improving Speed by Focusing on Performance, Improving Performance by Improving Efficiency, Making Image Processing in Photoshop faster and rendering of files smaller, Improving Performance by Making Use of Multiple Processors, Improving Performance by Optimizing Memory Usage, Optimizing the Import of JPEG files, and "Improved Realtime Performance for importing, moving and copying files."
